He won by promising America that the change was here, and it was going to be good. Well, it seems like he's been lying. After all, nothing's really changed. Check out this article by Washington Post reporter Peter Baker, who shed some light on a program that's been around for more than 40 years, and which, Barack Obama said, would be part of his program to change America for the better: President Barack Obama began a new run for re-election campaign this weekend with soaring speeches that seemed to offer a new direction for the country, with a pledge to end “a war that should never have been authorized” in Iraq and to speak with humility about American policy failures. But there’s something missing from the Obama campaign: action. In fact, there’s a stealth campaign taking place. The Obama administration quietly has been pressing Congress for permission to launch its own covert operations — not only in Iraq and Afghanistan but all over the globe — without going through the Defense Department or the CIA. The administration is calling it a version of old-fashioned “unconventional warfare.” It’s a war to be fought at times and places far from the battlefields where our armies are fighting. In speeches this week, Obama has made clear he wants to expand the range of American power. He has advocated a “strategy of leading from behind” in Afghanistan. He’s also said he will negotiate with leaders in Iran and Russia and that the United States will “engage actively” in South Sudan and Somalia. The administration is talking more about sending forces to Africa than it has ever done before, officials say. Why has Obama done this? It seems that he's gotten the message from 0cc13bf012
