English-language article The late 1970s saw a number of magazines introduced that attempted to capitalise on the vast numbers of immigrants settling in Britain. In 1976 the first of these, East and West London, was launched, and the publishers were able to lure in many of the migrants with promises of community groups, job centres and social services. In fact, the magazine was based in Germany and the picture of the London street fighting with the police which graced the front cover is not of British people at all but of men from a German film, Die Hard 3. Both Bair and Roberts were veterans of the Sunday newspaper Observer of Brighton. Bair had also been editor of the Nottingham Daily Post, and Roberts, who had been press secretary for the Labour politician Margaret Beckett, was also responsible for producing a short-lived women's magazine, Emma. The duo then set up their own magazine, East and West, on a co-operative basis. They used the following broadsheet title, which sounds like one of those "best of" series, with East on the front, West on the back, and the two of them under the headline "The Deed". The first issue of East and West London was published in the spring of 1976, the year of Margaret Thatcher's election victory and the wind of change that would blow through British politics that decade. It contained, among other things, a review of a pub quiz, a discussion of meditation, an interview with the great Peter Finch, a satirical piece on "lung-filling" public toilet paper and a survey of Britain's best and worst beaches. It also contained at least one piece of journalism, an account of an Irish family that had ended up in Britain. The family were moving to a council house in Hackney Wick, where the single dad found work as a personal chauffeur. "He gets good money. We make a decent living," the son told his sister. "And it's good to be making money." (The journalist's East End was clearly failing to keep up with the times, and no doubt he wished he had chosen to write an article about unemployment instead.) The magazine was edited by Tom Bair and Rob Roberts, whose names have been borrowed by the Rodeo publishers, who have a weekly that I never read. The tabloid Observer and the broadsheet Guardian are both English-language dailies published in London. They are organised as separate concerns under the same parent company,
