The overall goal of the Molecular Information Dynamics (MID) Laboratory is to develop and apply experimental and computational approaches for study of the structure, dynamics and interactions of RNA and other nucleic acids. Technologies to be developed include new experimental methods, large-scale study of novel systems, and data mining. The MID Laboratory will help interpret the results of studies performed in the Biophysics, Biochemistry, Chemistry and Computational Sciences Research Groups that are investigating RNA structure and function. RNA is a molecular messenger responsible for the transfer of genetic information in all forms of life. RNA is central to DNA transcription and translation and plays important roles in many cellular functions. Given the central role of RNA in the cell, it is no surprise that RNA is the target of many toxic compounds including the clinically important anti-HIV drug, didanosine. The MID Laboratory will focus on three interconnected areas of the RNA structure-function cycle: i) direct investigation of the structures of RNAs by NMR; ii) investigation of the mechanisms and pathways of RNA interactions with other biomolecules using analytical ultracentrifugation; and iii) analysis of RNA structure by computational means. The specific aims of this laboratory are: 1. To elucidate and catalog the conformations of nucleic acids and nucleic acid-nucleic acid complexes.

These investigations will focus on the use of new heteronuclear NMR approaches as well as hybrid exchange dipolar echo detected NMR spectroscopy. 2. To identify RNA structures and analyze their dynamics in solution. We will investigate the structures of ribosomal RNAs and tRNA by NMR spectroscopy and examine the role of RNAs in small ribonucleoprotein complexes using high resolution mass spectrometry, x-ray crystallography, and analytical ultracentrifugation. 3. To identify RNA-protein complexes and to determine the solution dynamics and topology of RNA-protein complexes. We will study a number of well characterized RNA-protein complexes including the ribosome by analytical ultracentrifugation and other biophysical techniques. This work will lead to general principles of RNA-protein interactions.
