Get the latest version ofÂ .Development of an intraarticular calcium hydroxylapatite implant for ligament reconstruction in the rabbit knee. The orthopaedic literature suggests that calcium hydroxylapatite implants may provide a solution to the problem of nonunion by increasing the mechanical strength of the reconstruction and thereby preventing postoperative collapse and long-term failure. In this study, we evaluated the efficacy of a collagen-calcium hydroxylapatite (HA) composite implant in intraligamentary and extraligamentary reconstructions in the rabbit knee. Thirty-two skeletally mature rabbits were randomly divided into four groups: group 1, normal controls; group 2, HA implants placed at the anterior cruciate ligament; group 3, HA implants placed at the medial collateral ligament; and group 4, HA implants placed at both the anterior cruciate and medial collateral ligaments. An intra-articular reconstruction and an extraligamentary reconstruction were evaluated in both knees of each rabbit using a custom-made load-to-failure device. The amount of gap formation and the mechanical strength of the reconstruction were measured. At the end of the 6-week period, seven of the 16 rabbits in groups 2, 3, and 4 had severe adhesions between the reconstructed tissue and bone, resulting in nonfunctional reconstructions. There was no significant difference in stiffness between the normal control group (11.1+/-4.5 N/mm) and the extraligamentary reconstructions in groups 3 (12.0+/-6.7 N/mm) and 4 (11.9+/-4.5 N/mm), whereas the intraligamentary reconstructions in groups 2 (0.19+/-0.09 N/mm) and 3 (0.14+/-0.03 N/mm) were significantly weaker than the normal control group (p
