One of the few games where there is a strong creative vision and an over-arching plot. The fun and humor is everywhere. Killer robots with laser beams and the ability to kill you from a distance. You can operate autonomous transport vehicles. Over 35 unique weapons to play with. The game is set in the future in a dystopian city. Scattered between the various levels of the city are the Game Over screens. If you are killed by the game's deadly enemies, (Killer Robots and Weaponized Magic) then you will find yourself in the Game Over screen. In each Game Over screen is a key to exit the game. An exit key is required to leave the Game Over screen and continue playing the game. Most Game Over screens have two exit keys, one to continue play and the other to restart the game. You play as Jack, a young scientist who is working on a game to be released in the new year called the Game Maker. You are a test player, and you are the only test player the game has ever produced. On the Game Maker's release day, you are accidentally pressed in front of a group of reporters. It is game testing day, and they want to know what you think of the game. You have only one life, and all the reporters are dangerous. You have been given a pistol that is near useless. You must find six different weapons to use to escape the level and continue playing the game. Adventuring around the city you discover the next part of the game is hidden. It seems that someone is trying to get in contact with you. You can share your saves with other players. The other players in the game can be strangers or friends. Items and weapons All items in the game are obtained by playing with the items in the game. The items can be activated through the game's interface. Activated items then appear in your inventory. Weaponized Magic: The Magic that you can find in the game is not real magic. You have found a security measure in the code that will allow you to use the real magic, but you don't have any. The security measures are for safety, so that no one would accidentally use the real magic if they had it. You will find Weaponized Magic throughout the game, usually in a box.
