Novel microfluidic device for ligation-free isolation and purification of DNA. Currently, there are several DNA separation techniques for effective and efficient separation of DNA from other biomolecules based on electrophoresis and capillary and slab gel electrophoresis. Each of these methods has its own advantages and disadvantages, such as the amount of time needed, tedious procedures, and equipment-associated costs. The most common methods, e.g., gel electrophoresis and capillary electrophoresis, are time consuming and often require a special clean-up step prior to sequencing. A microfluidic device, on the other hand, would have the potential to remove these steps altogether, lowering the overall cost and making these methods more affordable. In this study, a novel microfluidic device capable of separating DNA in a short time without using any special clean-up steps is developed. The device combines a polydimethylsiloxane (PDMS) microfluidic chip with a glass capillary to form a single chamber in which the PDMS chip is attached to the glass capillary. Since the two components are integrated, they have the ability to withstand high fluid pressures and simultaneous introduction of sample buffer and a buffer containing the DNA sample. The time for DNA separation and purification is less than 10 min. Furthermore, we demonstrate that the device is effective in purifying DNA of up to 500 ng using only 8 µL of sample solution. The approach proposed in this study opens up new possibilities for the fabrication of microfluidic devices.

There are many reasons that can lead to the development of a generic drug. Different from generics, pharmaceuticals are under patents. Once the patent expires, it is allowed to manufacture the new drug. However, there is always a huge competition among new pharmaceutical companies to seize a better position to offer more choices to their consumers. In order to compete with them, generics can be an answer. Pharmaceuticals can include the drug that is only for individuals. This type of drug should be used only by the customers who consume it. However, if you are looking for a drug for general use, generics can still be an answer. For the pharmaceutical industry, another good reason to produce generics is the safety aspect. If you have ever heard of thalidomide, chances are you might have heard about it causing birth defects. When a medicine is first released on the market, it might not be completely safe. When it is a generic, the effectiveness and safety of the drug can be fully verified before it is released for sale. If the drug that you need has already been developed by others, you can not avoid the effect of market competition. By making a generic version of the product, you will be able to save money. In this way, you will be able to compete with the leading firms because you will be able to reduce the costs. Of course, other factors such as the client's budget and the source from where it will be produced are considered. Another important advantage to be gained by using generics is the improvement of the treatments. When a new medicine is discovered
