make a function which return a member function pointer given a function name and class instance. How can I achieve this? The reason behind this is that, I have a function with a member function like this: void QMainWindow::draw(); I have a class like this: class QMainWindow{ public: void draw(); }; I just want to use the function like this: QMainWindow* win = new QMainWindow(); win->draw(); But the draw() function in the win object must be a member function of the class. So I want this function return a member function pointer of win class. I tried to make a function like this: void qGet(std::string &className, std::string &functionName, std::function funcPtr){ static class_map_t::iterator it = class_map.find(className); if(it==class_map.end()) { std::cerr second; } But, it does not work well. If I run the function like this: qGet("QMainWindow", "draw", [=]{ QMainWindow win; win.draw(); }); It run the draw() function inside a main function, but I want it run the draw() function of the class QMainWindow. So, how can I solve this? A: This works ok: #include #include
