Interleukin-2 induction of extracellular superoxide dismutase in human melanoma cells. Interleukin-2 (IL-2) induces a melanoma cell-specific response that is thought to be involved in tumor immune recognition. We have demonstrated in the present work that a new IL-2-mediated response in melanoma cells is superoxide dismutase (SOD) synthesis. SOD is a ubiquitous enzyme, which is normally responsible for scavenging reactive oxygen intermediates. The temporal pattern of SOD induction by IL-2 in melanoma cells is consistent with a role for this enzyme in cell protection during periods of oxidative stress.

The rapid identification of mycobacterial genomic sequences and their comparison is important in two areas. Firstly, the advances in sequencing technologies now enable the identification of virtually all sequences present in a genome. Identification of the sequences by relatively rapid methods is advantageous because this can direct, where possible, the selection of appropriate genes for sequencing. Secondly, determination of genomic sequence enables the study of the role of various genes and their products. A rapid method of determining mycobacterial sequence would greatly benefit both these areas.
