Mosaic auricles are uncommon. A microarchitectural study was performed in order to demonstrate the complexity of embryonic tissue proliferation and the importance of it in the formation of facial structures. We report the case of a 20-month-old boy with a complex auricular malformation. Clinical examination revealed an accessory temporal fossa, a cochlea horseshoe-like loop, and an accessory auricular groove at the level of the scutum.

Histopathologic study of the auricular samples revealed that cartilage from the main part of the auricle was derived from dorsal mesenchyme (proximal zone) at the time of auricular folding, whereas cartilage from the accessory auricular groove was derived from ventral mesenchyme (distal zone) by the second week of gestation. Cortical chondrogenesis occurred in the third week of gestation. The auricular groove was due to the failure of a continuity between the two portions of the auricle. The cochlea horseshoe-like loop was due to the absence of the rostral most part of the otic capsule and a stump of the cochlea. This embryogenetic study provides information about the delicate balance between the two essential steps of facial development: auricular organization and formation of the facial-fascia complex. Comedians to perform for Thursday fundraiser The 2013 Comedy Slam Team of Edinboro University hosts its second annual "The Edinboro St. Patrick's Day Comedy Show" at 8 p.m. on Thursday, March 14 at the Hybarger Hall on the Edinboro campus.

Tickets for this fundraiser are $10 and are available at the door or online at www.edinboro.edu/ComedySlamTeam. Tickets will be sold for one price for students and faculty/staff and for general admission for the public. The team will be performing up to three acts from its own repertoire, as well as from that of local and national professional comedians. The team will also
