In general, a display device having color filters is used to display an image in an electronic device. In the display device having color filters, each pixel includes sub-pixels of three colors, namely, red, green, and blue, for displaying an image. Recently, a display device having color filters may have a plurality of sub-pixels. For example, the display device may have nine sub-pixels, namely, red, green, blue, magenta, cyan, yellow, green, red, and blue sub-pixels, to display an image in high-quality color. In addition, a display device having color filters may have a wide viewing angle to realize a display with wide viewing angle. In this case, each of sub-pixels corresponding to red, green, blue and magenta, is obliquely viewed from the screen of the display device, and therefore, an image displayed in the display device is perceived as inclined due to color separation and mixed color. Proteasome activity in Mycobacterium avium-infected human macrophages. The proteasome plays an important role in maintaining protein homeostasis and turnover in both eukaryotes and prokaryotes. The ubiquitin-proteasome system is involved in the regulation of various cellular activities in bacteria. The effects of various oxidative stressors on the proteasome have been reported in several bacteria. To study the effect of oxidants on proteasome activities in a bacterial pathogen, this study investigated the proteasome in Mycobacterium avium-infected macrophages by the use of specific enzyme assays and compared it with the proteasome in non-infected macrophages. The results of these assays showed no detectable difference in the proteasome activities in the macrophages infected with different strains of M. avium. The data suggest that M. avium infection in vitro does not affect the ability of macrophages to degrade proteins by the ubiquitin-proteasome system.
